Subject: Proposed settlement

In other words, Microsoft won. Since they are not being broken up, Microsoft should have, at least, been required to make the Windows operating system open source. Concealing the source code of the operating system and allowing them to write software for the operating system gives them an unfair advantage, which they have abundantly abused in the past. Indeed, all the abuses for which Microsoft has been found guilty have their root in the secrecy of the Windows operating system source code.
